

Sense or Nonsense of a Legal Obligation to Evaluate Modernization Procedures within the Public Administration

Holger Schilling

Rechtsreferendar, District Court Erfurt

Abstract

This article deals with the question, whether there should be a legal obligation to use the instrument of evaluation with modernization in the public sector or not. The article first includes an overview concerning the different ideas of modernizing the public administration followed by an introduction into the different methods of evaluation. Next step is a discussion about the necessity of a legal obligation. The discussion touches the different international kinds of evaluation rules, focuses on the conflicts with constitutional law connected with a legal obligation and finally works on political questions related to such a codification. As a result the article presents a suggested way how to implement the instrument of evaluation into the process of modernizing the administration.
